RULE 28.1 LISTING

Glitsch, Inc., is a wholly owned subsidiary of Foster-Wheeler Energy Corporation. Glitsch, Inc.'s only non-wholly owned subsidiary is Century Plastics Incorporated.

QUESTIONS PRESENTED

1. Whether an individual Title VII claimant may establish a prima facie case of employment discrimination in failing to receive a job without proving he is qualified for the job.

2. Whether an employer in an individual Title VII action may be required to bear the burden of proving, "by clear and convincing evidence", that the employee was not qualified for the job being sought.

3. Whether, as a condition to recovery of lost wages, an individual Title VII claimant must prove that he sustained economic loss from the alleged discrimination.

PETITION FOR WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FIFTH CIRCUIT

Petitioner Glitsch, Inc. respectfully prays that a writ of certiorari issue to review the judgment and opinion of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit entered in this proceeding on December 23, 1980, with rehearing denied on March 4, 1981.

OPINION BELOW

The opinion of the Court of Appeals and its order on the petition for rehearing, which are not reported, appear in Appendix A hereto.

The trial before the United States District Court for the Northern District of Texas was bifurcated. The finding and conclusions of the District Court with respect to the liability phase of trial, which are not reported, appear in Appendix B hereto. The opinion of the District Court with respect to the remedy phase of trial is reported at 489 F. Supp. 990 and appears in Appendix C hereto.

JURISDICTION

The opinion of the Court of Appeals was entered on December 23, 1980. A timely petition for rehearing with a suggestion that the rehearing be en banc was denied on March 4, 1981. This Court's jurisdiction is invoked under 28 U.S.C. § 1254(1).

STATUTE INVOLVED

The statute involved is 42 U.S.C. § 2000e, et seq., which provides, in pertinent part:

> "It shall be an unlawful employment practice for an employer to fail or refuse to hire or to discharge any individual, or otherwise to discriminate against any individual with respect to his compensation, terms, conditions, or privileges of employment, because of such individual's race, color, religion, sex, or national origin * * * ."

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

This action was brought by respondent, Bennie D. Jones ("Jones"), a black male, against his employer of some twelve years, petitioner Glitsch, Inc. (the "Company" or "Glitsch"), seeking relief for alleged discrimination in employment on the basis of race. Specifically, Jones claimed that the failure of the Company to transfer him to another job upon his return to work, following two injuries to his back, and his subsequent termination by the Company due to his incapacity were prompted by racial discrimination. The Company, of course, denied these allegations.

After the completion of discovery, the District Court bifurcated the trial of the action and, as a result, heard evidence on the liability phase of the case first (see R. II and III). In finding liability on the part of the Company, the District Court held that:

> "In order to establish a prima facie case, Plaintiff was required to show initially (1) that he is black, (2) that he was discharged by Defendant, and (3) that there was a causal connection between his race and his discharge."[1] (Appendix B at xiii; R. I 178) [italics in original]

Most significantly, the findings of the District Court are bereft of affirmative findings that Jones was physically qualified to hold any particular job at the Company. To the contrary, the District Court specifically found that "[a]t the time of his discharge, Jones was not physically able to handle his duties" at the Company (Appendix B at viii; R. I 175).[2]

Subsequent to the liability phase, the District Court conducted a second hearing and received evidence on the remedy phase of the case (see R. IV). Having failed to consider the issue of qualifications at the liability hearing, the District Court was obliged to address the matter at the remedy stage, as Jones sought to be reinstated

2. This finding was supported by abundant evidence as Jones admitted shortly after his back injuries that "I can't do much of anything" (R. IV 39). By the liability phase of the trial, his condition was -- as he testified -- worse than at the time of his injuries (R. II 115). By the remedy phase of trial, his condition was even worse than it had been at the liability phase (R. IV 41).

to one of six positions with the Company. At this point, however, the District Court required the Company, rather than Jones, to carry the burden on this issue. Moreover, the District Court required the Company to establish a lack of qualifications "by clear and convincing evidence" (Appendix C at xviii; R. IV 14-15).

At the conclusion of the second hearing the District Court noted the arguments being advanced by Glitsch and, based thereon, outlined the questions to be briefed by counsel. In doing so, the District Court described the standard of proof he was applying:

> "[I]t seems to me that there is a position being taken here [by Glitsch] no way this man could be reinstated, no way he could be entitled to any pay. Assuming that everything -- just assuming for the sake of argument that it [i.e., Glitsch's position] is established by the clear and con> vincing evidence which is required, which is a heavy burden, that there is no job out there that the Plaintiff can do, never has been an opening and if there were one, he doesn't have the skill or the qualification, what is your view of the area of remedy?" (R. IV 203).

Later, after considering the briefs filed by the parties, the District Court concluded that:

> "Glitsch has demonstrated by 'clear and convincing evidence' that Jones was not in 1976 qualified (physically or by his skills) to perform five of the six light duty jobs he wants" (Appendix C at xviii; R. I 259).

In finding Jones entitled to back pay for the sixth position, however, the District Court held that Glitsch had failed to present the "clear and convincing" evidence that Jones was unqualified (see Appendix C at vi, xviii; R.I 260).

Subsequently, the District Court entered a judgment awarding Jones a monetary recovery for his alleged loss resulting from the claimed discrimination (R. I 264). Significantly, while finding that the Company had discriminated against Jones and compensating him for his claimed loss, the District Court denied Jones his request for reinstatement because of his physical incapacity (see Appendix C at xiv; R. I 264).

The judgment rendered by the District Court was affirmed in all respects by the Court of Appeals. In doing so, the Court of Appeals adopted the District Court's articulation of the elements of a prima facie case and its specification and allocation of the standard of proof at the trial of the remedy phase of the case.

REASONS FOR GRANTING THE WRIT

I.

The decision below conflicts with decisions of this Court. In the seminal case of McDonnell Douglas Corporation v. Green, 411 U.S. 792 (1973), this Court held that an individual claimant in a Title VII case is required to establish a prima facie case of employment discrimination and outlined the essential elements of that burden as follows:

> "(i) that he belongs to a racial minority; (ii) that he applied and was qualified for a job for which the employer was seeking applicants; (iii) that, despite his qualifications, he was rejected; and (iv) that, after his rejection, the position remained open and the employer continued to seek applicants from persons of complainant's qualifications" (411 U.S. at 802).

Departing from this analytical framework, both the District Court and the Court of Appeals concluded that the elements of the prima facie case required of Jones in this suit were:

> "(1) that he is black; (2) that he was discharged by Defendant; and (3) that there was a causal connection between his race and his discharge" (Appendix B at xiii; R. 178; Appendix A at iii).[3]

3. As a preliminary matter, it must be noted that although the District Court and Court of Appeals both focused on discharge, Jones himself did not complain of his termination from his position as a fork lift operator at Glitsch; he asserted, and the District Court found, that he was physically unable to perform that job. Rather, Jones complained of Glitsch's failure to transfer him to some other "lighter duty" position. Thus, both the District Court and Court of Appeals articulated elements purportedly applicable to a discharge case, when the suit before it involved a failure to transfer or reassign. That error, however, was but the prelude and precipitant for a more fundamental error.

This Court has stated that the prima facie case is designed to insure that "any Title VII plaintiff must carry the initial burden of offering evidence adequate to create an inference that an employment decision was based on a discriminatory criterion"[4] -- in other words, that there was a causal connection between the employee's race and the employer's action. However, in stating the third "element" of the prima facie case applied here -- i.e., a causal connection between the employee's race and the challenged employment conduct -- the District Court and the Court of Appeals did nothing more than restate the purpose and function of the prima facie case, not its elements. Both the District Court and the Court of Appeals failed to articulate what factual showing would suffice to establish the required causal connection between Jones' race and his failure to receive a different job at the Company.

Although this Court has recognized that the facts of Title VII cases may vary and that the elements outlined in McDonnell Douglas are "not necessarily applicable in every respect to differing factual situations" (411 U.S. at 802 n.13), it has nevertheless emphasized that certain aspects of the prima facie case are essential. For example, in International Brotherhood of Teamsters v. United States, 431 U.S. 324, 358 n.44 (1977), this Court observed that:

> "[T]he McDonnell Douglas formula * * * does demand that the alleged discriminatee demonstrate at least that his rejection did not result from the > two more common legitimate reasons an employer might rely on to reject an applicant: [1] an absolute or relative lack of qualifications or [2] the absence of a vacancy in the job sought."

Furthermore, this Court recently reiterated this holding by cautioning that:

> "The plaintiff must prove by a preponderence of the evidence that she applied for [1] an available position, [2] for which she was qualified, but was rejected under circumstances which give rise to an inference of unlawful discrimination. The prima facie case serves an important function in the litigation: it eliminates the most common nondiscriminatory reasons for the plaintiff's rejection."

Texas Department of Community Affairs v. Burdine, 49 U.S.L.W. 4214, 4216 (1981).

This principle is, of course, entirely consistent with the underlying purpose of Title VII itself. As this Court aptly observed in Griggs v. Duke Power Co., 401 U.S. 424, 430-31, 436 (1971):

> "Congress did not intend by Title VII to guarantee a job to every person regardless of qualifications.
> * * * Far from disparaging job qualifications as such, Congress has made such qualifications the controlling factor."

In following the dictates of this Court, other Courts of Appeals have recognized that, despite the flexibility of proof envisioned by McDonnell Douglas, a plaintiff must at the very least prove his qualifications in order to establish a prima facie case of discrimination. See, e.g., Aikens v. United States Postal Service Board of Governors, 23 EPD ¶ 31,144, at 16,900 (D.C. Cir. 1980).

In this case, however, Jones did not establish his qualifications for any particular job at the Company as part of his prima facie case. Indeed, Jones argued that he was not required to make such a showing as part of his prima facie case, and the District Court and the Court of Appeals agreed. Moreover, Jones did not advance or introduce proof of facts which would substitute for the absence of these critically significant elements or establish their irrelevance in the instant case.[5]

Instead, Jones argued, and the District Court and the Court of Appeals

5. Jones did not, for example, attempt to establish that Glitsch reassigned injured non-blacks who became unable to perform their duties to different jobs, regardless of their qualifications. Furthermore, the District Court did not make any finding to that effect.

apparently accepted, that his prima facie case was satisfied by showing:

> "(a) that he is black; (b) that he was performing a job which he became unable to perform; (c) that he was fired as a result; and (d) that the employer did not fire others who became unable to perform, but reassigned them to different job duties instead" (Brief of Appellee at 14).

Notably absent from Jones' formulation, of course, is any reference to his qualifications for an opening in a particular job.

In essence, Jones, the District Court, and the Court of Appeals have concluded that a causal connection between Jones' race and his failure to receive a transfer to one of the jobs sought was established merely by showing that others were so transferred. If such a minimum of proof was all that was required under the holdings of this Court, however, the plaintiff in McDonnell Douglas could have satisfied his burden by showing that he applied for a job but failed to receive it, while others applied for and did receive jobs. The decisions of this Court in McDonnell Douglas, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, and Burdine, however, make clear that the causal connection is not established in this fashion. In each such case the claimant's qualifications for an open position were stated to be an essential element of his proof.

The flexibility of proof envisioned by this Court was never intended to extend to the point where job qualifications -- so important to the drafters of Title VII -- became irrelevant. By eliminating these elements from the prima facie case, the District Court and the Court of Appeals have ignored the controlling precedent of this Court; have established a conflict with decisions of other Courts of Appeals; and have effectively disembowelled the underlying purpose and function of the prima facie case in Title VII actions.

II.

This case also presents an important procedural issue that has not been, but should be, settled by this Court. As noted above, the District Court did not require Jones to establish his qualifications as part of his prima facie case. Moreover, the District Court failed to consider the issue of such qualifications in reaching its decision as to liability despite evidence of Jones' lack of qualifications adduced at that stage. Indeed, the District Court did not address the issue of qualifications until later -- at the remedy phase of the trial, after it had already found the Company liable for discrimination. Most significantly, having already found it liable for discrimination, the District Court at the remedy phase placed the burden on the Company to prove that Jones lacked the necessary qualifications "by clear and convincing evidence". In following this procedure the District Court relied on the line of cases holding that once discrimination is proved, the employer has the burden to show by clear and convincing evidence that the claimant is not entitled to relief. The Court of Appeals endorsed this approach.

It is evident that the procedure followed by the District Court and approved by the Court of Appeals is untenable and undercuts important procedural requirements. As this Court has itself recognized, lack of qualifications is not a defense to remedy, but rather is a legitimate non-discriminatory reason for rejecting a job applicant in the first instance. See International Brotherhood of Teamsters v. United States, 431 U.S. 324, 358 n.44 (1977). As such, it is a defense to liability. Thus, even if the District Court did not require Jones to establish as part of his prima facie case that he was qualified for a particular job, it should at the very least have considered the evidence presented by the Company at that stage with respect to his lack of job qualifications. This evidence clearly constituted the articulation by the Company of a legitimate non-discriminatory reason for its actions. Had it done so, the burden upon the Company as to lack of qualifications would merely have been one of producing evidence sufficient to raise an issue of fact as to that point. See Texas Department of Community Affairs v. Burdine, 49 U.S.L.W. 4214 (1981). By removing the issue of qualifications from Jones' prima facie case and, indeed, from the determination of liability as a whole, the District Court relieved Jones of the burden that was properly his and placed it upon the Company. Equally erroneously, it also greatly magnified the burden upon the Company beyond any proper standard.

Clearly, the separate trial of issues in a case cannot properly be used in this fashion to re-allocate or increase the burden of proof. To do so is to eviscerate the principles laid down by this Court in McDonnell Douglas and Burdine. By approving such a procedure on the part of the District Court, the Court of Appeals sanctioned a serious departure from the accepted course of judicial proceedings that calls for supervision and reversal by this Court.

III.

As this Court has recognized, one of the primary purposes of Title VII is to make persons whole for injuries suffered on account of unlawful discrimination. See Albermarle Paper Co. v. Moody, 422 U.S. 405, 418 (1975). Despite this fundamental principle of compensation, the Court of Appeals below allowed back pay to be awarded to an individual Title VII claimant without any proof of economic loss. Jones, at trial, did not show that he was unemployed after he left Glitsch and, thus, failed to prove that he did not receive wages from other employment following his departure. Therefore, Jones failed to establish any economic loss suffered as a result of the alleged discrimination. Indeed, the record is devoid of any evidence related to Jones' subsequent employment history.[6] Whether Jones went to work elsewhere or remained unemployed after the termination of his relationship with Glitsch remains unanswered in the record. Nonetheless, the Court of Appeals affirmed the recovery of back pay awarded to Jones by the District Court. This decision

6. Jones has never claimed, either in the District Court or the Court of Appeals, that there is any evidence of his subsequent employment history after he left Glitsch. Instead, he has erroneously contended that the burden was on Glitsch to prove that Jones did or did not work at other jobs after his departure (Brief of Appellee at 28).

conflicts with the decisions of other Courts of Appeals in Taylor v. Philips Industries, Inc., 593 F.2d 783, 786-87 (7th Cir. 1979) and Harper v. General Grocers Co., 590 F.2d 713, 717 (8th Cir. 1979).

CONCLUSION

For these reasons, a writ of certiorari should issue to review the judgment and opinion of the Court of Appeals below.

GLITSCH, INC.,

Defendant-Appellant.

Appeal from the United States District Court for the Northern District of Texas

---

(DECEMBER 23, 1980)

Before CHARLES CLARK, REAVLEY and WILLIAMS, Circuit Judges.

PER CURIAM:

Bennie D. Jones brought this race discrimination in employment suit, based on Title VII, 42 U.S.C. § 2000e et seq. against his former employer, Glitsch, Inc. The district court found that Glitsch had discriminated against Jones on the basis of his race when Glitsch discharged him in November 1976, rather than assigning him to lighter duty work after a work-related injury. The district court granted Jones an award of back pay and attorney's fees. We affirm.

Glitsch first argues that the trial court erred in its application of the legal standard required for the plaintiff to establish a prima facie case of employment discrimination. Glitsch urges us to require inflexible application of the criteria set forth in McDonnell Douglas Corp. v. Green, 411 U.S. 792, 802, 93 S.Ct. 1817, 1824 (1973). [1]

McDonnell Douglas does provide the analytical framework for proof of a prima facie case of this sort, but its application necessarily varies with the differing facts of each situation. McDonnell Douglas, 411 U.S. at 802 n.13, 93 S.Ct. at 1824 n.13; Peters v. Jefferson Chemical Co., 516 F.2d 447, 450 (5th Cir. 1975). In view of the unusual facts presented by this case, we feel that the district judge's articulation of the requirements for a prima facie case was appropriate. If the plaintiff was able to prove: "(1) that he is black, (2) that he was discharged by the Defendant, and (3) that there was a causal connection between his race and his discharge", he has satisfied all that is required by McDonnell Douglas. Moreover, we cannot say that the district court's findings of fact on which he found that the plaintiff had established a prima facie case are clearly erroneous. Consequently, we affirm the district court's determination of liability.

We also affirm the district court's order concerning the remedy for Glitsch's discriminatory employment practices. In determining whether Jones was entitled to back pay, Glitsch contends that the district court improperly placed the burden on Glitsch to show by clear and convincing evidence that Jones would not have been hired absent the discrimination. This, however, is the correct standard of proof in such a situation. McCormick v. Attala County Board of Education, 541 F.2d 1094, 1095 (5th Cir. 1976) (per curiam); see also Marks v. Prattco, Inc., 607 F.2d 1153, 1155 (5th Cir. 1979). Nor was the district court clearly erroneous in its determination that Glitsch had failed to carry that burden regarding the position of messenger/driver.

The plaintiff is a "prevailing party" within the meaning of the statute, 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-5(k), and is entitled to the award of attorney's fees. He is also entitled to an additional award of attorney's fees for this appeal and we are competent to fix and award such fees in the proper case. Marston v. Red River Levee and Drainage District, No. 79-1966, slip op. at 1708, 1710 (Dec. 8, 1980). Accordingly, after considering the affidavit furnished us by plaintiff's counsel, we allow an additional award of attorney's fees in the amount of $3,000. The judgment below, as supplemented here is AFFIRMED.

FOOTNOTES

1. "The complainant in a Title VII trial must carry the initial burden under the statute of establishing a prima facie case of racial discrimination. This may be done by showing (i) that he belongs to a racial minority; (ii) that he applied and was qualified for a job for which the employer was seeking applicants; (iii) that, despite his qualifications, he was rejected; and (iv) that, after his rejection, the position remained open and the employer continued to seek applicants from persons of complainant's qualifications."

ON PETITION FOR REHEARING AND PETITION FOR REHEARING EN BANC

(March 4, 1981)

Before CHARLES CLARK, REAVLEY and WILLIAMS, Circuit Judges.

PER CURIAM:

The motion for rehearing treats our decision as holding that Glitsch had the burden of proving, by clear and convincing evidence, that Jones would not have been hired as a messenger/driver absent racial discrimination - as though and even if Jones had made no prior satisfactory proof of discrimination. We did not make that holding. The discrimination Jones proved was Glitsch's termination of Jones under a situation where, but for his race, he would have been assigned to lighter duty. After that fact determination, Glitsch faced a burden on the remedy determination.

In the second sentence of the full paragraph on page two of our prior opinion we should have said "Jones would not have been retained for other work absent the discrimination" instead of

"Jones would not have been hired absent the discrimination." Perhaps we contributed to the confusion.

Once discrimination was proved, Glitsch did have a burden on the remedy phase of the case. That was the intended meaning of the subject paragraph on page two of the opinion.

The Petition for Rehearing in DENIED and no member of this panel nor Judge in regular active service on the Court having requested that the Court be polled on rehearing en banc, the Petition for Rehearing En Banc is DENIED.

FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

Plaintiff claims Defendant discriminated against him on the basis of race in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, 42 U.S.C. §§ 2000e et. seq., and 42 U.S.C. § 1981. The specific violations alleged are Plaintiff's discharge from employment and the employer's refusal to reassign Plaintiff to lighter work after Plaintiff suffered an on-the-job injury. The Court bifurcated the trial pursuant to Rule 42(b), Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and trial was held August 28-29, 1979, only on the issue of liability.

Findings of Fact

Parties

1. Plaintiff Bennie D. Jones ("Jones") is a Black-American male citizen who resides in Dallas County, Texas.

2. Defendant Glitsch, Inc. ("Glitsch"), is a corporation located in Dallas County, Texas, which manufactures and sells pressure vessels and trays primarily for the petroleum refining industry. At all times relevant hereto Glitsch was an employer within the meaning of 42 U.S.C. 2000e(b). In the calendar year 1976 Glitsch had approximately 950 employees at its Dallas facility where Jones was employed.

Plaintiff's Work History

3. Jones worked for Glitsch for twelve years beginning March 26, 1964. Glitsch fired Jones on November 9, 1976, and notified him of the discharge on November 16, 1976.

4. At the time Glitsch fired him Jones was working as a Power Material Handler A. A Power Material Handler A drives a fork lift truck which moves parts and materials in the Tray Shop. Glitsch regards the fork lift operator's job to be a vital part of the manufacturing process at Glitsch. Glitsch does not consider the job to be light duty work.

5. Jones was the only witness who testified who had driven a fork lift. His job as a fork lift operator required him to drive in a cramped position inside the cab of the fork lift. The fork lift also subject its operator to a hard, repetitive jarring motion. This job also includes manually lifting heavy loads without the assistance of the fork lift.

6. During his employment by Glitsch, Jones had also worked as an Assembler and as a Messenger Driver, and had occasionally performed other jobs in the shop.

7. During his employment at Glitsch and before he injured his back in 1976, Jones had missed very few days from work. He had received over the twelve year period two disciplinary notices for absenteeism; both notices were issued while Morris Dunn was Jones' supervisor.

8. During Jones' period of employment Glitsch gave him sixteen merit raises; on three occasions (once in 1965, and twice in 1975 while under the supervision of Morris Dunn) Jones did not receive a merit raise for which he was considered. Jones also received five general salary increases during his employment. Jones' last pay raise in December 1975 -- three months before his back injury -- was a merit raise.

9. Jones' supervisor Morris Dunn testified that Jones was a good employee. Other representatives of Defendant acknowledged that Jones had a good employment record.

Injury and Discharge

10. On or about March 3, 1976, Jones injured his back while at work at Glitsch. He was referred to a physician and did not return to work until May 24, 1976. He promptly returned to work with physician's restriction of "no heavy lifting". Glitsch told Jones to return to his regular duties as fork lift operator. After a few hours at work May 24 Jones aggravated his back injury and was againt sent to a physician.

11. Jones promptly reported to work again July 6, 1976, with a physician's restriction of "no heavy lifting". Glitsch again had Jones to return to his regular duties. Within a day or two Jones again complained of his back injury and was again sent to the physician.

12. On or about September 20, 1976, Jones againt promptly reported to work with a release from his physician. The release did not specify any restrictions. Glitsch determined that the release was not a "full release" and told Jones not to return to work until he obtained a full release from the physician.

13. On or about November 6, 1976, Jones was released by the physician and reported to Glitsch for work on November 8. Jones believed that this release was not a full release because the doctor had told him to "take it easy". Upon reporting to work Jones was unable to perform his regular (assigned) duties because of the back injury. He inquired if there was any lighter duty work he could perform. Glitsch told Jones to "clock out and go home", which he did.

14. On November 9, 1976, Glitsch fired Jones (without notifying him), for "inability to perform assigned duties".

15. On November 16, 1976, Jones returned to work at Glitsch after having seen his doctor November 15. Jones was then told that he had been fired November 9.

Evidence of Discrimination

16. At the time of his discharge Jones was not physically able to handle his duties as a fork lift operator. However, he was able to perform lighter duty work. Glitsch's evidence showed that at the time Plaintiff was terminated no lighter duty work was available; in view of the number of employees at Glitsch at this time, the variety of jobs and the history of some injured employees (primarily non-black) having been assigned lighter duty for temporary periods, the Court finds that this evidence is not credible.

17. Glitsch's employee relations officer, Mr. Swank, who fired Jones, felt that Jones was "faking" his back injury but was unable to say why he so believed.

18. At the time Jones was fired Glitsch had a discipline system which applied to all but the most serious offenses. Under that "progressive" discipline system Glitsch would give an employee one written warning, followed by another written warning, followed by a suspension, followed by discharge. This discipline system was applicable to Jones' situation and should have been utilized. Glitsch presented no explanation as to why this discipline system was not utilized in Jones' case.

The Court finds that Glitsch considered Jones' situation to be a disciplinary matter. Glitsch told the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission that Jones was discharged because he "failed to perform assigned duties". A Glitsch representative (Mr. Lingell) testified that Jones was discharged because of his unwillingness to attend to his work. (The stated reason in November, 1976, for Jones' termination, was "inability to perform assigned duties".)

19. On occasion Glitsch had assigned injured non-black employees to lighter duty jobs. No injured non-black employee had been treated as harshly as Jones.

20. In 1975 Glitsch terminated 45 employees "for cause" of which 20 (44%) were black and 20 were white. Black representation in Glitsch's work force was 15.1% in 1975.

In 1976, the year Glitsch fired Jones, 11 (32%) of the 34 "for cause" terminations were black employees, while the black representation in the work force at Glitsch was 17.6%.

21. Plaintiff's statistical expert testified that the 1975 and 1976 disparities between blacks fired and their representation in the work force is statistically significant. The expert testified that it was virtually impossible for this disparity to have been caused by chance. These statistics are helpful but not controlling. McDonnell Douglas Corp. v. Green, infra, at p.805.

22. Glitsch did not prove a non-racial reason for the disproportionate numbers of black terminations "for cause" in 1975 and 1976.

23. Supervisors at several levels at Glitsch make discharge recommendations to higher management personnel, who make the decision to discharge an employee. The recommendation of the supervisor is customarily followed. During 1975 and 1976 there were no black supervisors and no black management personnel at Glitsch.

24. Jones' work history until his back injury shows that he was a good employee. After his back injury he returned to work promptly each time his doctor released him for work. This fact together with his prompt request for a lighter duty job show Jones' desire to work. If he had been physically able he would be driving his fork lift.

25. Because Glitsch had assigned to lighter duty white employees who could not physically perform their regular jobs, the Court infers that the failure to assign Jones to lighter duty was motivated in part by race. If Jones had been non-black, Glitsch would have utilized its "progressive" discipline system rather than summary discharge.

Conclusions of Law

1. This Court has jurisdiction of the subject matter and the parties.

2. In order to establish a prima facie case, Plaintiff was required to show initially (1) that he is black, (2) that he was discharged by Defendant, and (3) that there was a causal connection between his race and his discharge. McDonnell Douglas Corp. v. Green, 411 U.S. 792 (1973). Plaintiff established a prima facie case.

3. Plaintiff having established a prima facie case, Defendant had the burden of proving by a preponderance of the evidence a legitimate, nondiscriminatory reason for Plaintiff's discharge. Pond v. Braniff, 500 F.2d 161, 167 (5th Cir. 1974); Turner v. Texas Instruments, 555 F.2d 1251, 1254 (CA 5, 1977). Defendant did not carry this burden of proof.

4. Even if Glitsch could be considered to have proved a legitimate, nondiscriminatory reason for Jones' discharge, Jones proved by a preponderance of the evidence that the reason was pretextual.

5. Defendant discriminated against Plaintiff on account of race in violation of Title 42 U.S.C. 2000e et seq.

6. Defendant is liable to Plaintiff, and Plaintiff is entitled to a trial on the issue of remedies for this Title VII violation, on a date to be set by the Court.

MEMORANDUM OPINION

This is a suit about race discrimination in employment based on Title VII, 42 U.S.C. §§ 2000e et seq. Plaintiff Bennie D. Jones alleges that his former employer, Glitsch, Inc., discriminated against him on the basis of his race (Black-American) when Glitsch terminated him in 1976. The Court bifurcated the trial. The liability phase of the case was tried August 28-29, 1979, after which the Court entered Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law declaring Glitsch had discriminated against Jones on the basis of race. The Court found Glitsch discriminated against Jones by discharging him rather than assigning him to lighter duty work after an on-the-job injury. On February 25, 1980, the Court heard evidence on the issue of appropriate relief.

Plaintiff asks the Court to enter an order requiring Glitsch to place him in one of six jobs Jones has identified as "light duty" jobs.[1] He also

1. These jobs are spot welder, punch press operator, brake press operator, tool crib attendant, messenger/driver, and office clerk. The first three jobs each have an Operator A and Operator B classification. "A" jobs tend to require more skill and experience, and consequently pay better than "B" jobs. At one time Jones worked as a messenger/driver at Glitsch. He has never been on the payroll as a spot welder, punch press operator, or brake press operator, but he testified he has done these jobs occasionally while working at Glitsch as a fork lift operator.

wants the Court to enjoin Glitsch from discriminating against him on the basis of race, a hiring order, back pay, and attorney's fees. Defendant Glitsch argues that the Court should deny Jones a job at Glitsch and back pay because of his lack of physical or skill qualifications, the lack of job openings in lighter duty jobs, or both -- in short, that no relief be granted to Plaintiff.

Defendant underestimates the flexible nature of the remedies provided in 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-5(g), and the insistence of the courts that relief be granted where discrimination has been found. The Court concludes that Plaintiff, having been discriminated against, is entitled to relief. Failure to give any relief to a plaintiff who has suffered a Title VII injury would thwart the purposes of the statute and contradict decisions of the United States Supreme Court and the Fifth Circuit.

I. FACTS

Briefly summarized these are the facts found by the Court on October 1, 1979, after the trial on liability. Bennie Jones, a Black-American male, had a good employment record at Glitsch, Inc. for the twelve years he worked there. Findings 1, 3, 7, 8, 9. He was a fork lift operator at the time of his termination in November 1976. During 1976 he injured his back while he was working. He tried several times to return to his job and operate the fork lift, but he found his back injury was too painful for him to work. Finding 10. The last time he returned to work he asked for lighter duty work, but was told to go home. Finding 13.

Several days later on November 9, 1976, Glitsch fired Jones, allegedly for "inability to perform assigned duties." Findings 14, 15.

Findings of Fact 16 through 25 detail the evidence supporting the Court's conclusion that Jones' discharge and the failure to assign him lighter duty work was caused in part by race discrimination. The five most important indicia of discrimination were: (1) the summary nature of the discharge and Glitsch's unexplained failure to use its progressive discipline system which would have given Jones a warning; (2) lack of credibility of Glitsch's testimony regarding the non-availability of lighter duty jobs at the time of Plaintiff's discharge; (3) disparate treatment between blacks and whites who had been injured on the job; (4) the credibility of Jones' avowed desire to work at a lighter duty job; and (5) the disproportionately high number of black discharges in 1975 and 1976.

The Court now makes the following Supplemental Findings of Fact, based on the February 25, 1980, hearing:

1. From November 8, 1976, through February 1980 Plaintiff had the physical capability and skill (with minimal training) to perform the job of messenger/driver at Glitsch.

2. Glitsch does not indefinitely retain any employee on its payroll who is physically disqualified from performing any type of light duty work, or who lacks the requisite skills for a job. A white employee whose physical condition had deteriorated like Jones' had at the time of the relief trial in February, 1980, could not have expected to be retained on the payroll indefinitely.

3. Between the time of the liability trial (August 28-29, 1979) and the relief trial (February 25, 1980) Jones' back injury had worsened to such an extent that at March 1, 1980, he was not be able to perform any light duty job at Glitsch. The Court bases this finding on Jones' testimony in February about his increased difficulty in movement, and on the Court's observation of the difference between Jones' physical appearance in August 1979 and his physical appearance in February 1980.

4. Since November, 1976 there have been minimum wage jobs available in the Dallas area which could be performed by a person with a back injury with no special skills. Jones could have found such a job by using reasonable diligence.

II. RELIEF

The relief section of Title VII, 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-5(g), authorizes these remedies: injunction, reinstatement or hiring, back pay, "or any other equitable relief as the court deems appropriate." Title VII has been recognized as a vehicle for giving equitable relief to those who have suffered discrimination. United States v. Georgia Power Co., 474 F.2d 906, 927 (5th Cir. 1973). Glitsch contends that Jones, whom the Court has declared to be the victim of race discrimination, is not entitled to any relief. The Court profoundly disagrees.

Glitsch's argument ignores the well-established equitable principle that equity will not tolerate a wrong without granting a remedy.

> The constant tendency of the court is to find some way in which damages can be awarded when a wrong has been done. Difficulty in ascertainment is no longer confused with right of recovery.

Story Parchment Co. v. Patterson Parchment Co., 282 U.S. 555, 565-66 (1931), quoted in Johnson v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 491 F.2d 1364, 1380 (5th Cir. 1974) (Title VII case). Furthermore, in order to implement the purposes of Title VII, this Court must give a wide scope to the relief accorded a Title VII plaintiff. Johnson v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 491 F.2d at 1375; Rowe v. General Motors Corp., 457 F.2d 348, 354 (5th Cir. 1972).

Controlling in the remedy phase of a Title VII suit is the "rightful place" principle. Pursuant to this principle a person discriminated against should be assured the first opportunity to move into the next available vacancy which he would have occupied but for the discrimination and which he is qualified to fill. United States v. Georgia Power Co., 474 F.2d at 927; Pettaway v. American Cast Iron Pipe Co., 494 F.2d 211, 434-44 (5th Cir. 1974). Application of the "rightful place" principle is an attempt to reconstruct the work history of the plaintiff as it would have been had there been no discrimination. Clairborne v. Illinois Central Railroad, 583 F.2d 143, 148, 149 (5th Cir. 1978).

A tacit assumption of the "rightful place" approach is that a discrimination victim must be qualified for the job he seeks in the absence of the discrimination before he is entitled to an injunction, a hiring order, or back pay. The court in McCormick v. Attala County Board of Education, 541 F.2d 1094, 1095 (5th Cir. 1976) (per curiam), charted the course for evaluating the evidence at the remedy stage:

> The principles governing a discriminatee's right to back pay and individual injunctive relief in this circuit are clear. Once discrimination is proved, a presumption of entitlement to back pay and individual injunctive relief arises. The burden of proof then shifts to the employer to show by clear and convincing evidence that the discriminatee would not have been hired absent discrimination. Mims v. Wilson, 5 Cir. 1975, 514 F.2d 106, 110; Cooper v. Allen, 5 Cir. 1972, 467 F.2d 836, 840. If the employer cannot meet this burden, then back pay must be awarded unless special circumstances are present. Pettaway v. American Cast Iron Pipe Co., 5 Cir. 1974, 494 F.2d 211, 253.

A. Hiring Order

At the time of his disability Jones was having difficulty operating the fork lift, because of his injury. He still is not physically able to perform the fork lift job, and so cannot be reinstated to that post. The position Jones would have occupied but for the discrimination - his "rightful place" - is a lighter duty job. This Court determined (October 1, 1979, Order) that Glitsch would have made available a less strenuous job for Jones if he had been white, regardless of whether an opening existed. Of course, Glitsch is not required to place Jones in a job he is not qualified to fill due to his physical condition or because he lacks the skills the job requires. See United States v. Georgia Power Co., 474 F.2d at 927; Pettaway v. American Cast Iron Pipe Co., 494 F.2d at 243-44. The Court must reconstruct all the evidence impacting on Jones' qualifications for a lighter duty job. This historical reconstruction is complicated by the fact that Jones' physical condition has worsened since the date of his discharge, and has even deteriorated between the trial on liability and the trial on relief. The law requires that the reinstated person be qualified for a job before the Court will order that he be placed in that job. A hiring order is inappropriate if a person is no longer qualified for the particular position. Kamberos v. GRE Automatic Electric, Inc., 603 F.2d 598, 603 (7th Cir. 1979); cf. Donnell v. General Motors Corp., 576 F.2d 1292, 1303 (8th Cir. 1978) (no back pay if plaintiff cannot satisfy the physical limitations of job).

The Court is of the opinion that Jones is no longer physically qualified to fill any of the light duty jobs at Glitsch. He therefore cannot be granted a hiring order.

The Court could order Glitsch to give Jones the next available opening in a light duty job which he would have occupied but for the discriminatory discharge. Pettaway v. American Cast Iron Pipe Co., 494 F.2d at 243-44; United States v. Georgia Power Co., 474 F.2d at 927. Glitsch escapes this remedy only because of the fortuitous (for Glitsch) circumstance of Jones' deteriorating back injury.

B. Injunction

Because Jones will not be working at Glitsch in the future, an injunction to cease discriminating against him is inappropriate. Jones has requested a mandatory injunction to make his employment records reflect this Court's finding that his discharge was caused by racial discrimination. The Court doubts the efficacy of such relief. The Court does, however, direct Glitsh to delete from Jones' employment record any references or inferences that he was discharged for "inability to perform assigned duties." This relief, which is authorized by the "other equitable remedy" language of 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-5(g), may in part prevent any future damage to Jones from his wrongful discharge by Glitsch.

C. Back Pay

The Supreme Court has ruled that back pay is an integral part of the Title VII scheme. Albermarle Paper Co. v. Moody, 422 U.S. 405 (1975); accord Johnson v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 491 F.2d 1364, 1376 (5th Cir. 1974); United States v. Georgia Power Co., 474 F.2d 906, 921 (5th Cir. 1973). The Court should not decline to award back pay if to do so would undermine the two-fold purposes of Title VII: eliminating unlawful employment discrimination and compensating the economic injuries of the discrimination victim. Albermarle Paper Co. v. Moody, 422 U.S. at 417-19.

The District Court's discretion in declining to award back pay is very limited. See id. at 415-17. The rationale for this narrow discretion and the standards by which it is exercised have been stated thus:

> Because of the compensatory nature of a back pay award, and because of the "rightful place" theory, adopted by the courts, and of the strong congressional policy, embodied in Title VII, for remedying employment discrimination, the scope of a court's discretion to deny back pay is narrow. Once a court has determined that a plaintiff or complaining class has sustained economic loss from a discriminatory employment practice, back pay should normally be awarded unless special circumstances are present.

Pettaway v. American Cast Iron Pipe Co., 474 F.2d 211, 252-53 (5th Cir.

1974). Glitsch's argument that no job openings exist does not satisfy the "special circumstances" exception. The Court has found that Glitsch would have located a lighter duty job if Jones had been white. However, Glitsch has demonstrated by "clear and convincing evidence" that Jones was not in 1976 qualified (physically or by his skills) to perform five of the six light duty jobs he wants. Of course, just as with a hiring order, a person who is no longer physically able to perform a job is not entitled to back pay during the period of his disability. See Donnell v. General Motors Corp., 576 F.2d 1292, 1301 (8th Cir. 1978).

Due to his back injury Jones in 1976 could only perform light duty work, which this Court views as work which would not aggravate his back injury.

Because of the back injury Jones could not have been assigned to, and can receive no back pay for, the jobs of brake press operator (which Defendant has proved requires lifting dies which weigh several hundred pounds), or punch press operator, which also require physical work beyond Jones' ability. The Court has doubts as to Jones' ability to perform the physical work required of a tool crib attendant. Nor can Jones receive back pay for the lighter duty job of clerk-typist; he does not possess the requisite typing skills. Similarly, the spot welder post requires ability to read blueprints, which Jones cannot do.

But there is one job at Glitsch which Jones has performed in the past, which he had the skills to perform (or with minimal training could perform) and which does not require much physical work or skill -- the position of messenger/driver. The Court believes that Jones could have performed this job during the period November 9, 1976, to March 1, 1980, and is entitled to back pay therefor. The Court finds that by March 1, 1980, Jones' back injuries had worsened to such an extent that he was unable to perform even this job, and that such condition is likely to continue.

In computing back pay, the Fifth Circuit has recognized two governing principles:

(1) Unrealistic exactitude is not required, and

(2) Uncertainties should be resolved against the discriminating employer. Pettaway v. American Cast Iron Pipe Co., 494 F.2d 211, 260-61 (5th Cir. 1974); see also Johnson v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 491 F.2d at 1380, (5th Cir. 1974) ("...In many instances proving entitlement to back pay will be based on probabilities ... Onerous and speculative limits should not be utilized as a bar to the restoration process.") The formula for calculating back pay like all Title VII relief involves a process of historical reconstruction of plaintiff's work history. Plaintiff is entitled to back pay from the date he would have been paid (November 9, 1976) absent discrimination to the date he would have terminated employment, less mitigation.[2] Mims v.

2. Mitigation is required by 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-5(g):

> "Interim earnings or amounts earnable with reasonable diligence by the person or persons discriminated against shall operate to reduce the back pay otherwise allowable."

Wilson, 514 F.2d 106, 110 (5th Cir. 1975).

The statute directs the Court to reduce Plaintiff's back pay award by "amounts earnable with reasonable diligence." 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-5(g). The burden of proving reasonable diligence and the amount of mitigation is upon the defendant. Glitsch's proof on mitigation was conclusory and imprecise. Two experts testified there were jobs (requiring little or no skill or physical work) available in Dallas during the relevant period which could be classified as light duty, and which jobs Plaintiff could have located if he had exercised reasonable diligence; no evidence was presented from which the Court could compute the amounts earnable from such jobs. The Court has found that such jobs were available and could have been located by Jones "with reasonable diligence." Supp. Finding No. 5, supra. The Court will use the federal minimum wage as the basis for calculating the "amounts earnable" at such jobs.

Defendant argues that Plaintiff should not be awarded any back pay because Plaintiff could have found work at a wage comparable to his wage at Glitsch. Defendant's proof did not support this contention. In any event, it would undermine the purpose of Title VII to find Glitsch guilty of discrimination and yet afford Plaintiff no significant relief, by way of back pay. If the Court sustained Glitsch's argument, any employer located in a prosperous economic area could violate the statute with impunity. The debilitating effect on Title VII of this kind of argument is obvious and the Court rejects it.

As requested by the Court the parties filed on May 16, 1980, a stipulation regarding earnings with respect to mathematical calculations of earnings, from which the Court determines that Jones should be awarded back pay in the sum of $16,594.88, which sum is computed as follows: $34,103.68 (salary at mid-point rate for messenger driver, November 9, 1976 to March 1, 1980) less $17,508.80 (federal minimum wage for the same period).

D. Attorney's Fees

Defendant says Plaintiff is not a "prevailing party" within the meaning of 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-5(k), and so cannot be awarded his attorney's fees. The Court disagrees, finding that the statutory purpose and case authority are to the contrary.

Plaintiff became a "prevailing party" when the Court held with Plaintiff and determined that Glitsch had discriminated against Plaintiff on the basis of race. This finding alone entitles Plaintiff to attorney's fees. The Supreme Court in a Title II case has said a plaintiff who succeeds in proving discrimination should be awarded attorney's fees "unless special circumstances make such an award unjust." Newman v. Piggie Park Enterprises, 390 U.S. 400, 402 (1968). The Court has applied this standard to Title VII attorney's fees awards. Albermarle Paper Co. v. Moody, 422 U.S. at 415 (1975). Plaintiff does not have to be awarded all the relief he seeks to be a "prevailing party." Brown v. Boorstin, 471 F. Supp. 56 (D. D.C. 1978).[3] Awards of attorney's fees encourage enforcement of Title VII, in accordance with the purpose of the statute and underlying public policy.

3. Defendant cites Harrington v. Vandalia-Butler Bd. of Educ., 585 F.2d 192 (6th Cir. 1978), cert. denied, 99 S.Ct. 2053 (1979), for the proposition that a plaintiff must be awarded damages to be a "prevailing party." Harrington is inapposite because in Harrington plaintiff did not prevail on her claim of discriminatory discharge. Moreover, the Fifth Circuit has rejected the Sixth Circuit restrictive view of Title VII remedies. See Clairborne v. Ill. Cent. R.R., 583 F.2d 143, 154 (5th Cir. 1978).

As it turns out Jones is a "prevailing party" within Defendant's interpretation of Harrington. He will be awarded some money as back pay. But the Court does not base the award of attorney's fees on the fact that in this case the mitigation amount does not wipe out the back pay award. Even if "special circumstances" existed to justify denial of back pay, or even if the back pay was totally eliminated by actual or possible wages, this Court would still treat this plaintiff as a "prevailing party" and would award attorney's fees for the policy reasons stated in the text.

The parties have stipulated Plaintiff's attorney's fees to be $16,000. The Court finds this is a reasonable sum, and it will be awarded as part of the judgment.[4] In the event of an appeal, Plaintiff can make application for additional attorney's fees at the proper time.

Plaintiff will forthwith submit to the Court (not later than 5:00 P.M., May 29, 1980) a Judgment in accordance with this Opinion.

4. The Court bases the conclusion that the stipulated fee is reasonable on these factors:

(1) The reputation, skill, and experience of Plaintiff's attorney in handling Title VII cases;
(2) The competence and aggressiveness of the defense attorney who mounted a "never give an inch" defense;
(3) The rather low rate of success of individual Title VII suits, particularly those based on subtle, nonovert, acts of discrimination.

SO ORDERED.

DATED: May 22, 1980.

JUDGMENT

This case was tried before the Court without a jury August 28-29, 1980, as to liability, and February 25, 1980, as to remedy. On October 1, 1979, the Court filed its Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law as to liability and on May 22, 1980, its Memorandum Opinion as to remedy, pursuant to which Plaintiff is entitled to judgment.

IT IS ORDERED, ADJUDGED AND DECREED by the Court that:

1. Plaintiff Bennie D. Jones do have and recover of and from Glitsch, Inc., the sum of Thirty-Two Thousand Five Hundred Ninety-Four and 88/100 Dollars ($32,594.88) ($16,594.88 back pay plus $16,000.00 fees for Plaintiff's counsel, Kenneth H. Molberg), with interest thereon at the rate of nine percent (9%) per annum from this date until paid.

2. Defendant shall delete from Jones' employment record any references or inferences that Plaintiff was discharged for "inability to perform assigned duties."

3. All relief not herein granted be, and it is hereby, denied, and all costs of this action are taxed against the Defendant.

SIGNED this 30th day of May, 1980.
